

Perception of a large building in a metropolitan city. Climate is warm - at least on this day. The building has an overhang (covers a portion of the sidewalk), a lot of glass facing the street and large glass doors that push in.

A man in a grey suit carrying a briefcase is entering the building. Lobby area is very elegant - shiny black marble, large spray of flowers, ornate mirrors. It has the feel of a hotel - very expensive.

He enters in elevator and goes to a top floor - there aren't many rooms of this floor and the ones that are here are widely spaced.
Again, the atmosphere is fish.

He enters the room at the end of the hallway.

There are several men in the room waiting, and ~~as~~ as they rise to greet him. He is very business-like (no nonsense). He places his briefcase on a conference-type table and extracts a sheaf of papers, which he hands out to the others. These papers seem to be some sort of financial analysis with graphs (pie, bar & line) with projections. It also feels as if the purpose of the meeting is to weigh the information presented in order to make a decision of future activities. There is
